amount of expense to the Government that might be curtailed if all branches of the department could be brought under one roof. We could use the entire building of the State, War, and Navy Repartments nicely, without a bit of room going to waste. If the State and Navy Departments could be moved out we could get along satisfactorily and take care of all our different branches and bureaus with their employes.

"If the War Department were to be given this entire building there should be a new one constructed to take care of the State and Navy Departments. If the building were constructed large enough, the Department of Justice might also be placed under the same roof with them.

"The Department of Justice is most in feed of a building in which to bring all its officials and employes under one roof. All three of those departments are closely allied with each other, particularly the State and Navy Departments, and those two, at least, it seems, should be kept in one building. I don't know whether the suggestion that the War Department move out and leave this building to the State and Navy would be feasible, as there would probably he more room than those two departments could use, and perhaps not quite enough for these two and the Department of Justice. The War Department, of course, is the largest of the four departments mentioned, as we have perhaps as many employes as all three of the others. We have in the aggregate about 1.500 employes and the aggregate about 1.500 employed aggregate about nave in the aggregate about 1.500 em-ologies, and they are scattered in many ouildings. It would be a great saving in time and labor in administration alone, as well as in the curtalling of rent and maintenance expenses, to have them all under one roof."

The Demo crats, who have been far more ready, with promises to this interest than have the Republicans, are ready to make the most of conditions, and to urge that if labor's vote had helped put the Democracy in power. Democracy's promises would by this time have been executed. But this sort of political gossip is very different from delivering the goods, say politicians. The history of efforts to onservative men have insisted that this comservative men have insisted that this was an ideal condition which ought not to be interfered with. Labor leaders themselves have generally taken the same view. The fact, then, that their disappointment and exasperation have been led to make such direct and sinister threats as were voiced by the leaders in their discussion with the President and the Speaker, is esteemed of far more than ordinary concern.

That it will continue this pace of increase, and that the labor movement will be a great factor in this increase, is predicted by many observers. There is no doubt that underlying the feeling which has been so vigorously voiced this week, there is a growing tendency among this class of voters toward socialism; a feeling that neither of the old and regular parties is much more reliable than the other for the purposes of the working man: that the Socialist program promises more than any other.

Working men have been studying these questions to an extent, and approximate with a unanimity of conclusion, in recent years, that would give serious pause to most casual observers of affairs. The socialistic vote is well known to represent but a small proportion of the people with socialistic tendencies. If, then, the effect of this new labor movement in the political field shall be noted in any striking fashion in the results next November, it is thought likely to be especially shown by the Socialist vote. As between Republicans and Democrats, they appear commonly to have contributed about equally to this vote, where it has been largest. The two big parties have been left in about their original relative positions, and this is what politicians think will happen for some years to come.

But distinctly labor movements in politics have none the less been rare, and their successes still more rare, in this country. That success should be attained in so gigantic an undertaking as the labor leaders have just outlined seems beyond all possibility. It might have appreciable effect in localities where strong labor leaders would organize and take advantage of it; but as a national movement, politicians agree, it is hardly likely to make itself felt with anything like the force that is suggested by the figures that Mr. Gompers quotes.

The clergy walked half way up the length of the church and formed an alse through which Bishop Paret and Bishop Satterlee passed. Members of the clergy took seats in the front pews on either side of the main aisle.

As a result, members of Congress have been deluged with letters from rural carriers urging them to have the satchels furnished, and the Congressmen have been calling on Fourth Assistant DeGraw in large numbers.
